Solution My main question is what kind of protection does my e-mail have on it? Is it like having an unencrypted router? Should it be using TLS? The point is the Internet is one big "secure" area, but you just can't live your life online securely, you have to live a more "sane" online life. Are you telling me that there is something that I can't put on my computer that keeps me more secure? I only have a vague idea about TLS. Could you explain a little more? That is why it is important to have a second device that you can plug in that has a reliable Internet connection. A good simple second device is the Belkin wireless router. They have a model that can do a "port forward" (i.e. direct a port from the public Internet to your computer) and also has WPA2 encryption (if the device is new). You can pick up a "3G" wireless modem/router/access point for about $30-$50 and plug it in to that Belkin and it will work. It's not really "safer" but it's better than nothing. You should be able to pick up a wireless router for $30-50 and it would be sufficient for most situations. It's a good idea to have a firewall to filter out any bad guys but without a second device the firewall doesn't do anything. If you use Internet Explorer to browse the web (yes, I use it too), it will use the SSL protocol, but if you use Firefox you don't, because it's not as good at supporting the encryption protocols. You can use your firewall to block some of the "interesting" websites but that doesn't help when you are accessing some of the "popular" sites that are known to be insecure. I really need to put more effort into it, as it is my sole source of income. I have a small weekly income and I have bills to pay. It can't afford the 82157476af
